

The Journal History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for Tuesday, 26 October 1858 indicates that General Johnston was invited to move his troops from Camp Floyd to the Provo Bench:

A company of merchants and campfollowers have gone to establish a city on the Provo Bench to be called Centre City. It is reported that they have invited General Johnston to locate a military post there, and move in the spring with his troops.

Governor Cumming requested President Young to send men to occupy all the land. The president [Brigham Young] said he did not wish to interfere, but would let them build a city, it will be a long time first, unless they get the "Mormons" to build it for them, and then they would cheat them out of their pay; he would like them to get the apostates to build the city for them.

A military post was not established on Provo Bench. Eventually, Johnston's troops left Utah, and the Salt Lake City residents moved back to their homes. Because their settlement in Utah Valley was temporary, these people had little economic effect on the benchland area.

The Nauvoo Legion, which had been partially reorganized in Utah on 27 March 1852, used the bench for their military drills. Andrew Jenson, LDS Church historian, wrote in his autobiography:

In October 1870, I had my first experience in military training, a county military drill being held at Camp Burton, located on the so called Dry Creek, on the Provo Bench, about four miles southeast of Pleasant Grove. About 4,000 men were gathered from different parts of Utah County, and the drill was carried out with strict discipline and order. This was a part of the annual drilling of the Nauvoo Legion. I rather enjoyed the exercises and at once felt a desire to train as a soldier and aspire to become an officer in that military organization. This, however, was not to be in my case, for after two more annual drills, which I attended and enjoyed, orders were given by Acting Governor Shaffer of Utah for the "Mormons" to cease their military evolutions.

On 30 July 1870, Fort Rawlins, a temporary military fort was established on the bench two and one-half miles north of the Provo River. The military was stationed there to protect Provo citizens from Indians, but a permanent fort was never built. For several reasons, the temporary fort was closed down by June 1871.

Fort Rawlins was undesirable from the viewpoints of the command and the soldiers. There was poor communication with higher command and the facilities were poor. Contempt from the townspeople worsened these problems to the point of open rebellion among some 20 of the 40 soldiers stationed at the fort.

On 22 September 1890, drunken soldiers marched prominent Provo men down West Main Street at gunpoint. Besides the verbal abuse inflicted on these men, property damage was incurred by other citizens whose houses were shot at by the passing soldiers.

Because Fort Rawlins existed for such a short time, it had little economic effect on the benchland area.

HYDROELECTRIC POWER

In 1890, Mr. L. L. Nunn successfully built and operated the first industrial hydroelectric power plant, the Ames Plant, near Telluride, Colorado. It transmitted alternating current at high voltage three miles away. In 1894, he began looking for possible hydroelectric power sites farther west in the Rocky Mountains. He chose the Provo River as the site for

NUNN'S STATION, PROVO CANYON
Courtesy Utah Power and Light Company

"It Happened in Orem"
p 51